* The list contains administrative tribunals under the central enactments. The term "administrative tribunal" has been used in the narrow sense of a body which is not part and parcel of a government department (though discharging quasi-judicial functions), but a body somewhat independent of the departmental influence. Though great care has been used in listing here only such bodies, yet the possibility of a few departmental bodies having been included in the list may not be ruled out because of certain difficulties in identifying various bodies ; similarly for the same difficulties it is not unlikely that a few "tribunals" may have been left out. In preparing this list if any departmental body has been included it may be due to the author's own predilection to regard those bodies as are not concerned with departmental policies to be "administrative tribunals". As stated in Chapter VII, where departmental policies are not material, the task of adjudication ought to be entrusted to an "administrative tribunal" which is not an integral part of the government department.
