

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

THIS TREATISE, originated as a research project of the Indian Law Institute, has passed through many cycles of developmental processes in the course of working, researching and ultimately its publishing. The high dignitaries, many prominent universities, institutions and persons are to be gratefully acknowledged for the accomplishment of this formulative research endeavour of a decade old.

I am extremely grateful to Hon'ble Dr. S.D. Sharma, Vice-President of India, for writing an excellent and thought-provoking foreword for this book. I express a sense of gratitude to Hon'ble Mr. Justice Ranganath Misra, Chief Justice of India, and President, Indian Law Institute, for providing me encouragement through a socio-legally oriented foreword. I am also enormously thankful to the Hon'ble Mr. Justice M.N. Venkatachaliah, Judge, Supreme Court of India, and Chairman, the Hon'ble Judges Committee, Indian Law Institute, for changing the format of recognition to the author of research work in all the forthcoming publications of the Institute, which was really a good departure from the old one in the larger interest of legal creativity.

I owe a fundamental intellectual debt of gratitude to the magnificent library of New York University Law School where I studied and spent a considerable time in stimulative consumer law research during my three visits to the U.K., United States, Canada and Germany in 1982, 1983 and 1985. During these visits I pursued legal research on the project study at the excellent law libraries of the School of Oriental and African Studies, London University, London; McGill University, Montreal; University of California, Berkeley; East-West Center, Honolulu, Hawaii; Columbia University, New York; Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, Yeshiva University, New York; The Conference Board, Inc., New York and Ferei University, Berlin etc. Thereafter, I also had two opportunities to visit Japan, Australia, Korea and Hong Kong in 1986 and 1987 and carried on the project work as a keen researcher on consumer law at the University of New South Wales, Kensington (Sydney); Sydney University Law School, Sydney; Australian Law Reform Commission, Sydney; Australian National University, Canberra; University of Tokyo, Tokyo; Seoul National University, Seoul; and University of Hong Kong, Hong Kong etc. The growth in the research project is attributed sufficiently to these great universities and institutions. Therefore, I express my heartfelt thanks to the authorities of these great temples of learning which provided me enough insight to develop the perception of empirical consumer research relating to protection theories and ideas based on pragmatic consumer philosophy suited to the India's populace and their living conditions that laid the foundation for this research project.

Consumer Protection Law in India

It gives me a great pleasure to express my appreciation and thanks to my erstwhile eminent colleagues with whom I worked during my tenure in the Madhya Pradesh State Law Commission and particularly in the Consumer Protection Sub-Committee of the Law Commission as Chairman in the formulation of the Madhya Pradesh Consumer Protection Bill, 1984, which was the first serious attempt to frame State consumer law in the country. In the process of preparation of the said Bill, I learnt many pragmatic and intricate aspects of the emerging state consumer law for my home state, Madhya Pradesh, which, inter alia, helped me a great deal in evolving consumer law and its basic principles in the project study. Thinking in the project study on the one hand and interaction in the preparation of Madhya Pradesh Consumer Protection Bill, 1984, on the other, enabled me to suggest a national model at the centre in the Advisory Consumer Protection Council later renamed as Central Consumer Protection Council of the Union Ministry of Food and Civil Supplies of which I was a member for several years. The Madhya Pradesh Bill was widely circulated and debated many times in the various meetings of the then Advisory Consumer Protection Council in which I suggested the scope and blueprint of a national model of emerging consumer law for the country. In this regard, I express my sincere gratitude to Shri H.K.L. Bhagat M.P., the then Union Minister of Food and Civil Supplies and Parliamentary Affairs, who accepted many ideas of my project study and his pragmatic and visionary thinking on consumer problems made me to think afresh on certain areas of this study. In fact many of my ideas got incorporated in the Consumer Protection Act, 1986, much before the publication of this project study. This triangular cross communication enriched me enough and provided me good opportunities to improve some of the chapters of the book due to the developing insight into consumer problems in the process of developing mechanism of consumer justice by the government at the state and centre.

Thanks are also very much due to the United Nations, Division for Economic and Social Information, Department of Public Information for United Nations Guidelines for Consumer Protection; office of the

Acknowledgements

Consumer Affairs, Government of Ireland, Dublin, for legal material on Irish Consumer Law; International Organisation of Consumers Union (IOCU) for rich legal and non-legal comparative material; Consumer Education and Research Society, Ahmedabad, for published and unpublished material; Consumer Guidance Society of India, Bombay; Forum of Free Enterprise, Bombay; Council for Fair Business Practices, Bombay, Glaxo Business Review of Glaxo India Ltd., Bombay and hosts of voluntary consumer organisations for making available reading material in the preparation of this tome.

I have been the beneficiary of rich collections of Parliament House Library. The Indian Law Institute Library, in spite of its limitations, contributed appreciably in this study venture, hence thanks are also due to its staff.

Shri M.L. Mishra, Editor, Vidhi Sahitya Prakashan, Legislative Department, Union Ministry of Law and Justice, very kindly accepted on personal basis the task of preparing the tables of cases, statutes and orders and subject and author indexes of the treatise, for which I am extremely thankful.

Shri Gagan Singh and Shri M.L. Wadhwa, who typed several drafts of all the chapters with dedication and their typing skills displayed in repeated drafts of manuscript, deserve special thanks. Shri R.K. Shankar, an expert in book production, provided careful and meticulous reading of the manuscript and proofs time and again and materialised this publication through the press for which I am very much grateful.

Indeed, the Delhi Printers, the printers of the book, deserve special appreciation for their unhesitating cooperation in printing in spite of undue delay in its release.

Lastly I own responsibility for my errors and omissions in this project study of eco-legal importance in this vast country—India.

